Postdoctoral Fellowships in Clinical and Applied Alcohol Research

Description

Rutgers University has support for three new NIAAA-supported positions to train fellows for careers in clinical and applied research. Fellows will participate actively in ongoing research, complete pilot projects, have opportunities for publications and presentations, and prepare independent research grants. Fellows may conduct research assessments and therapies to learn specific clinical research skills, and will be working in a university environment with graduate and undergraduate students. Fellows may work with any of several faculty: Drs. Marsha Bates, Brenna Bry, Elizabeth Epstein, James Langenbucher, Thomas Morgan, Helene White, Valerie Johnson, or Robert Pandina.

In the clinical area, research includes alcohol subtyping, impact of comorbid depression and other psychiatric disorders on severity and treatment of substance abuse, clinical trials of CBT models for alcohol dependent women, marital therapy for substance abusers, mechanisms of change in CBT for alcohol use, nosology of substance use disorders, retention and engagement in substance abuse interventions, and disseminations of empirically supported treatment to "real world" settings (Epstein, Langenbucher, and Morgan). In addition, research is being conducted in neurocognitive models of addictions treatment outcome, alcohol challenge effects on implicit and explicit memory, longitudinal research on the etiology, consequences, and comorbidity of substance use, crime and mental health problems in community (Pandina, Bates, and White). Prevention research includes the evaluation of prevention and intervention programs, the efficacy of peer led and adult mentoring prevention programming within high schools, and prevention and early intervention of adolescent problems (Bry and Johnson).
